

Dear Pharmacy Students,

Students for Antimicrobial Stewardship Society (SASS) is a student-led organization dedicated to raising antimicrobial stewardship awareness among students of the different health care professions across Canada. Founded by University of Toronto medical students in 2015, we endeavour to represent students regarding antimicrobial stewardship at the national level, interfacing with industry, medical organizations, educational institutions, and government. Our goal is to change the culture surrounding stewardship among the next generation of health professionals through education, engagement, and advocacy.

Antimicrobial stewardship is not just a challenge that physicians must face, but is an inter-professional collaborative effort between medicine, pharmacy, nursing, dentistry, public health, and veterinary medicine. All have a role to play in working to safeguard our antimicrobials. While SASS has successfully launched within the medical school, we would like to reach out and expand beyond our own program.

SASS is looking for inter-professional partners. We hope to involve not just student leaders from different faculties, but to bring our campaign and our program to others. If you are interested in learning more about collaborating with us or know of others who might be interested, please contact us at sass.toronto@gmail.com. For more information about our organization, please visit <http://www.sass-canada.ca/>

Thank you, and we look forward to hearing from you.

Alainna Jamal and Sarah Silverberg
SASS Canada Preclerkship Chairs